RESEARCH PROFILE

My research is mainly in legal and political theory. It is foremost analytic. Some of my work employ normative methods as well. Most of the projects I direct use an interdisciplinary approach. I enjoy research tasks that are comprehensive and challenging, yet translates into concrete changes. I have mainly focused on:

1. Citizenship and migration in relation to the rule of law

I have written extensively on citizenship, nationality, and migration. My signature contributions include the functionalist theory of citizenship and the theory of migration as institutional fact. The first is a conceptually engineered general theory of citizenship, designed to be applicable to legal, political, and social forms of citizenship alike. It allows de lege ferenda analysis of citizenship laws. It submits that criteria for acquisition and loss of the status needs to fit the entitlements connected to it. If they are not aligned by functional correlation, citizenship becomes an arbitrary instrument of social closure. It has broken new ground and delivered policy innovations. I first presented the theory in a research monograph (2014). Positively reviewed, it has been the object of a special issue of a peer-reviewed journal, an international conference, a PhD dissertation, and used as course literature. I have recently published a monograph in Spanish presenting my functional theory of citizenship and insights into the history of citizenship from a transdisciplinary perspective (2019). I employed methods of semantic, textual and conceptual analysis, conceptual engineering, and conceptual history. I show how conceptions of citizenship vary according to the disciplinary perspective. For social scientists, the opposite of the citizen is the excluded or marginalized person; for lawyers, it is the non-national, and for political scientists, it is the disenfranchised subject. In the monograph European Citizenship After Brexit (2017) I applied the functionalist theory of citizenship to analyze EU citizenship, offering policy suggestions. I pointed out that Brexit poses a constitutional dilemma to Union citizenship. One horn is that the transnational rights of EU citizenship could not be erased at will by the withdrawing state; then there is a risk of sacrificing the will of the people to withdraw on the altar of individual rights. The other horn is that these rights may very well be suppressed if a State decides to exit – sacrificing Union citizens’ rights on the altar of democratic self-determination. I suggested ways out of the dilemma and clarifications that the European Court of Justice could provide. An open-access chartbuster, it has been downloaded more than 89K times, and was recently nominated for the UACES Best Book Prize. The book received a substantial amount of institutional attention, including by Brexit chief negotiator Michel Barnier and the EU Parliament, where it is now selected literature by the Policy Department for Citizens’ Rights and Constitutional Affairs. Two cases are currently pending before the European Court of Justice inspired by my theory, a contribution to the impact that I would like my work to engender. My ideas in the book also inspired the Bertrand Russell Foundation for Peace to convince the EU Commission to register two European Citizens Initiatives. Over 190,000 individuals across 27 countries adhered to the initiatives. This shows how I capitalize on theoretical insights to reach out to a broad contemporary audience.

I have also worked on the State’s right to exclude, constitutional emergencies, and a number of ‘legal black holes’ including detention of stateless persons in view of deportation. Recently, I analyzed a fundamental disagreement in international law concerning people on the move: Some think there is a paradox at play in that international law gives a person a right to leave the state where (s)he is physically present, regardless of nationality, but no matching right to enter elsewhere. Others deny this to be the case. I did not add another voice pro et contra the wrongfulness of the alleged state of affairs in international law. Rather, I clarified the nature of the disagreement by offering a systematic problem-setting and analyzing the truth-makers of the opposing claims in the debate. My work on migration builds on social ontology and realist legal theory. My main contribution is the theory of migration as institutional fact: law constitutes statuses relating to things that, in ordinary language, are conceived as empirical facts (e.g. citizenship, residence, habitual dwelling, migration and population). These concepts, found in the law, are institutional facts determined by particular constitutive rules. This implies that migration law often misconceives its object. In connection to this, I developed a theory of the nature of arbitrary law-making (2018). I analyzed the concept and offered a typology of forms of arbitrariness that do not depend on commitments to particular normative ethical theories (2020).

2. Constitutional Theory, Design of Peoplehood

In constitutional theory, I developed the theory of constitutional population design. It is based on the idea that migration and citizenship laws play an important part in shaping one of the state’s ‘constitutive elements’, namely its population. Through the design of institutional facts, the number and social characteristics of those who count as members of a population change. My work has demonstrated that the regulations on who counts as a member of a given population determines who the members of that population will live with; whether, e.g., citizens are granted family reunification rights (2021). I focused in particular on India in this line of research. I have argued that both whom we admit and whom we do not admit impacts on our social and constitutional identity (2020). I made a methodological breakthrough by designing a way to assess the constitutionality of changes in areas of law allowing population design. Hitherto the ‘empty vessel’ theory of citizenship, championed by legal doctrine, could not evaluate the consistency of such legal changes with the constitutional framework. This theory is right in pointing out that citizenship differs, from one legal system to another, both in legal content (rights and duties), and in the criteria of acquisition and loss. But it wrongly assumes that this variance hinders us from determining whether a change in the law is consistent with the role of the citizenry within the constitutional setting. In my view, that it varies does not prevent us from finding out how it varies. To do so, I look beyond the constitutional writ to establish the constitutional identity of citizenship by using a plurality of sources (e.g. constitutional traditions, constituent debates, case-law, amendments).

3. Principles for Inclusion in the Citizenry

Having long taught democratic theory at the Department of government, my work on the principles of inclusion in the demos (a.k.a. the boundary problem) starts from the observation that it is unclear which normative principles are available, how these ought to be understood and assessed. I have worked on (variants of) the all-subjected principle, all affected interest principle and on the principle of contributivism, namely the idea that economic contribution should ground political influence. This idea is gaining traction. The global market for buying citizenship grows 20% annually. 70% of EU countries offer permanent residence statuses for investment. Contributions are often invoked in debates about migration. I have shown that it is a normatively ambivalent principle: it works in both inclusive and exclusive ways. My team was recently awarded 6M SEK grant from the Swedish Research Council, the largest grant awarded to philosophy last year, for research on contributivism. We study practices that make economic contributions a ground for enfranchisement either directly, as in citizenship-by-investment programs, or indirectly as in investment immigration policies (2018). My research design combines theory development with systematic empirical studies: in-depth comparative studies of the laws enabling “citizenship for sale”, medium-N cross-national analysis of parliamentary debates and surveys on popular attitudes. I apply conjoint analyses in the surveys. The method was previously used in marketing but I apply it to political and moral preferences. Hereby I develop a methodology for assessing normative attitudes without incurring in desirability-bias. This enables my team to establish prospective trends and evaluate the likelihood of success of policies extending franchise to non-nationals, by tapping into attitudes on contributivism in different countries.

4. Information Technology, Freedom of Speech, Digital Ethics

Some work is in philosophy of information, information ethics, and legal informatics. I co-authored a case-study for the Global Network of Interdisciplinary Internet & Society Research, directed by the Berkman Center at Harvard, on Internet Exchange Points (IXPs). IXPs exemplifies multistakeholder governance in action. By tracing out the plurality of models used for IXP governance and comparing the processes of developing peering relationships, I highlighted the decisions they each faced, including trade-offs between inclusiveness and effectiveness (2015). I have directed dissertations relating to free speech in the digital age, edited a special issue on the Public domain and democracy in the digital age and worked with Luciano Floridi (OII, Oxford), Giovanni Sartor (EUI), and Judith Simon (Hamburg) on ethics of big data. I have also defended the view that, to understand the issues that technologies raise today in relation to political liberty, attention should shift from the level of contents of the Internet to its more basic architecture and governance (critical internet resources, protocols, governance ecology, etc.) (2016). Political science long shunned the field of Internet governance. But there is an interesting debate on how we should handle this new world we have in common, constituted by the infosphere. I showed why the debate on the control of the Internet is misleading: too much attention on traditional institutional actors obscures the fact that the seats of power are elsewhere. Moving within the private ordering that characterizes Internet governance, in a way that is respectful of fundamental rights, requires to recast the relationships between social powers.

3. Legal Realism, Positivism, Legalism and Conceptions of Justice

I am a leading expert on legal realism and the author of an award-winning monograph on the leading intellectual figure of Scandinavian legal realism (and founder of non-cognitivism): A Real Mind on Axel Hägerström (2009). I have also written on Chinese legalism, and worked extensively on legal positivism. I co-edited of the Cambridge Companion to Legal Positivism (2021). As section editor on ‘Legal Schools of Thought’ Encyclopaedia of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy, I have developed an editorial line that pays attention to non-Western traditions of thought (mainly Islamic, Chinese, and Indian) as well as regionally significant schools of legal thought from the global South (e.g., Latin-American garantism). I am interested in understanding how ideas about the nature of justice play out in diverse judicial settings across the world and how comparative law can help better grasp these ideas.

5. Justice, Harmony, Solidarity, and the Emotions

I have worked on justice, harmony, and solidarity. This research is grounded on philosophy of the emotions and comparative philosophy (2012). I focused on the disagreement on whether and when (lack of) emotion is a problem for decision-makers in the justice system, and which types of emotions ought to be fostered among decision-makers (2017, 2021). Much is yet to be done on the reciprocal interaction between emotion and institutional design: How emotions sustain and impact on social structures, and how these arrangements shape the display of emotions should interest legal scholars.

TEACHING

I have a vocation for teaching. Prior to my academic career I worked as a teacher in Philosophy at the Lycée Français Chateaubriand de Rome (Italy), then n. 4 on the ranking of the Agence pour l'enseignement français à l'étranger. I have taught, or teach, several areas in Philosophy (Political Philosophy at the Philosophy Department, Political Theory at the Department of Government, Ethics, Applied Ethics, Meta-ethics, Philosophy of Law, Legal Theory, Theories of Human Rights, Theories of Adjudication, Theories of Legal Reasoning, Ethics of Information Technology, Moral Philosophy) and in Law (EU Law, Jurisprudence, Constitutional Theory and Public Law, Migration Law, Cyber Law). I regularly teach at Master's and doctoral levels, and have taught undergraduates for over 20 years. My skills in teaching and supervising are appreciated. I have supervised PhDs, post-docs, research fellows as well as graduate and undergraduate students. I thrive in my role of supervisor—supporting students' ability in consideration of their skills and interests requires serious listening and foresight. Discovering and fostering potential is, in my view, an important part of my job. With training in pedagogy and academic leadership from Uppsala University, I practice innovative teaching methods such as flipped classrooms, problem-based learning, and mixed-methods didactics, with an emphasis on first-hand reading of texts and critical thinking. In my role as Director of Uppsala Forum, I have designed courses for postgraduates including skills courses in writing successful grant applications, presenting research in the media, and yearly Marie Skłodowska Curie Fellowship mock-assessment workshops.

RECENTLY ORGANIZED EVENTS (selection)

In my role as Director of Uppsala Forum, I have been responsible for the internationalization of research, and for the organization of a number of events, such as joint seminars, workshops, international conferences, round table discussions and graduate and postgraduate courses. Under my direction we organized 40-50 events yearly, with numbers of participants ranging from 35 to 280, including the yearly Forsskål Lectures – one of Uppsala Universities honorary lectures, with a focus on Freedom of Expression – graduate conferences on climate change, migration and sustainability, as well as conferences jointly organized with external partners, e.g. the Swedish Parliament for the centennial of the breakthrough of parliamentarism in Sweden. More information on our website.

In my role as Professor at the Philosophy Department, I direct the higher seminar series in philosophy of law since 2015, and have long taken part in the organization of the Hägerström Lectures.

In my role as PI, I regularly organize seminars, workshops, and international conferences with my research team. Recent conferences have included e.g. the 2019 International Conference on Legal Positivism, incl. speakers: Andrei Marmor (Cornell), Stefano Bertea (Leicester), Torben Spaak (Stockholm), Fred Schauer (Virginia), Kevin Toh (UCL), Tomas Gizbert-Studnicki (Cracow), Michael Steven Green (William and Mary Law School), Brian Leiter (Chicago), Wil Waluchow (Mc Master), sponsored by Riksbankens Jubileumsfond and Wenner-Gren Foundation; or the 2017 Knut & Alice Wallenberg Foundation Centennial Symposium Human Progress in the 21st Century – Bright and Dark Sides of Democratization (program here) incl. speakers: Donatella della Porta (Scuola Normale Superiore), Staffan I. Lindberg (V-dem, Gothenburg), Håvard Hegre (Uppsala), Sabine Carey (Mannheim), Erica Chenoweth (Denver), Jan Eliasson (former Deputy Secretary-general of UN), and Charlotte Petri-Gornitzka (CDAC Chair, OECD), sponsored by KAW or the 2017 the international conference On the Move - Exploring Contemporary Dynamics of Migration, organized with U4 Society University Network, incl. speakers: Alexis Spire (CNRS Paris, Gijsbert Vonk (Groningen), Helena Wray

(Exeter Law), Linda Bosniak (Rutgers Law), Phillip Cole (UWE Bristol), Sarah Fine (King's College), Stephanos Stavros (Council of Europe) among others.

My experience in organizing international conferences of a certain goes back in time: In 2013 I organized the International Conference European Citizenship – Twenty Years On, with speakers e.g. Rainer Bauböck (EUI), Andreas Føllesdal (Oslo), Dora Kostakopoulou (Warwick), Pavlos Eleftheriadis (Oxford), Kees Groenendijk (Nijmegen), Albert Weale (UCL), Willem Maas (York, Canada), Agustín Menéndez (Léon), Jo Shaw (Edinburgh), Christian Joerges (Bremen), Adrian Favell (Sciences-Po), Stefano Giubboni (URGE), Michelle Everson (Birbeck), with the opening address of the Minister of Foreign Affairs Birgitta Ohlsson, sponsored by Swedish Research Council and The Cassel Foundation (video here); in 2011 I organized the Axel Hägerström Centennial Conference, and in 2009 the Norberto Bobbio Centennial Conference in Turin, Italy.
